The Right University for You

Are you thinking of applying to colleges and universities in the United States? Do you feel overwhelmed by how many choices there are? You are not alone. The United States boasts the largest and most diverse higher education system in the world, with more than 4,000 colleges and universities. Deciding where to apply can be a complex task; however, the more organized your search, the more effective it will be.

Before applying, you should determine your personal criteria for a U.S. college or university. The following are examples of things you might consider, but you should also add criteria of your own.

ACADEMIC FACTORS

What do you wish to study? Liberal arts? Sciences? Business? Engineering? A specific trade or technical area? Determining your program of study is a good way to start identifying universities. It is OK if you are undecided; many U.S. schools will let you enter as such, allowing you to choose your major field of study later on.

SIZE

Would you like to go to a school with 30,000 students or 3,000? The largest U.S. universities have tens of thousands of students on a single campus; the smallest have fewer than 1,000. Determine which campus environment feels most comfortable to you.

FINANCIAL FACTORS

What are the annual costs for attending the college or university of your choice? You must consider tuition, room and board (the cost to stay in the dormitories and to eat in the dining halls), books, fees, and personal expenses. If you know that you will need financial assistance to attend a school in the United States, look for schools that offer scholarships or financial aid specifically for international students.

Remember that although the choice may seem difficult, by weighing each possibility carefully you will come to a sound decision that will have great impact on the next few years of your life.
